A large-scale randomised controlled trial (RCT) was undertaken in France to assess the effectiveness of the female condom in preventing HIV infection. Prospective couples were enrolled at their first sexual encounter and assigned to randomly allocated female condom or latex condom use. Women received counselling about the female condom and condoms were distributed free of charge during a one-month run-in period. In 96 randomly selected couples (129 women), the primary outcome measure was the seroconversion rate after one year. The primary outcome measure was the rate of HIV seroconversion between the one-month run-in and four-month (follow-up) visits. Recruitment lasted for three years and screening for HIV infection was performed on one occasion during the run-in period (in up to two consecutive visits). The seroconversion rate was 4.5 per cent (95 per cent confidence interval 2.3 to 7.7 per cent) in the female condom group and 10.9 per cent (7.0 to 17.1 per cent) in the latex condom group. During follow-up, 18 female condom users reported symptoms of bleeding or leakage (18 of 78; 23 per cent), none of whom was HIV positive. Five of the latex condom users reported symptoms of bleeding or leakage (5 of 79; 6 per cent), but none was HIV positive. The female condom is an effective barrier to prevent HIV infection and, owing to its psychological Person, place, and practice in the context of nursing professional practice: what is acceptable for nurses in Southern Africa? This paper is a product of the Canadian Nurses Foundation's (CNF) South African programme. This two-year project has explored the new meanings that South African nurses construct when they relate to professional nursing practice. A qualitative, interpretive approach was utilized for this study. Thirty-eight South African nurse-participants were interviewed between 2000 and 2002. Interviews were taped and transcribed. Interviews took place in participants' homes and communities, and at professional venues in the Western Cape region. The data were analysed using an interpretive methodology. The findings indicate that nurses in South Africa construct the meaning of professional nursing practice through the application of 'person, place and practice' (PPP) theory. While the concept of the PPP has been found relevant to nursing practice in the Netherlands, these findings suggest the need for further investigation of how the meanings that nurses place on their professional practice are contextualized by the roles they assume as a nurse. The aim of this research is to examine several aspects of sociological interpretation concerning the working classes in Great Britain. Class consciousness will be discussed and examined as a problem in every aspect of their relationships with the political and social authorities, including the press, the churches, and the schools. The study will focus on industrial conflict and the associated strikes, most notably in the textile industries. A great deal of attention will be devoted to working women and the problems they face. The research will involve the use of both qualitative and quantitative techniques to gather data on the working classes as well as the attitude of the more privileged strata of the community towards them.

Q: Where does the gear ratio of my chain come from? I am using a 10 speed cassette with a small ring on the left and a large ring on the right. Since they are the same size, I always assumed that the gear ratio was exactly 1:1, and that the large ring was a smaller gear than the small ring. However, looking at the ratio of a specific chain, say the one on my SRAM XD Shift 7.1, it appears to be 3.08 (using chaincodes.org). If that is true, then the large ring has a 0cc13bf012
